

List of contributors

Barnabas Balint is a Master of Studies student in Modern European History at Magdalen College, University of Oxford. He completed his undergraduate degree in History at the University of Exeter in 2019, where he researched young Hungarians' survival strategies in Auschwitz-Birkenau. His master's thesis, supervised by Dr Zoe Waxman, explores and develops youth as a category of analysis for Jewish responses to the Holocaust in France.

Ben Hales is a finalist Ancient and Modern History undergraduate at Lady Margaret Hall, the University of Oxford, and an incoming MPhil Modern Chinese Studies postgraduate. Having developed a strong interest in Chinese minority nationality policies, borderlands development and the human rights issues therein during his work on Tibet, he hopes to further such research during graduate study. He is also a contributor to The Meridian, a student publication on politics and international affairs.

Leon Hughes has just graduated from Mansfield College, after doing a BA in History. He is planning to do a master in Urban History and Cultural Studies at ULIP and QMUL (University of London in Paris and Queen Mary). His research interests revolve around the history of emotions, urban history, GIS methodologies and the French Revolution.

Calvin Jordan is a Masters Graduate from Rhodes University, South Africa. He is aspiring to become a History of Science & Medicine and Global Health (infectious disease control and prevention) PhD candidate. He has research and professional development interests in the influences and effects of Empire and Colonialism on present-day global & community health, focusing on HIV/AIDS, intervention and prevention efforts, policy, and practices. Calvin is keen to connect and chat with academics and professionals in this and related interdisciplinary fields.

Nicholas Leah graduated from Lincoln College, Oxford with an MPhil in British and European History. He previously completed his undergraduate historical studies at University College London. His research interests focus on the imperial law making of Great Britain in the eighteenth-century and the role played by merchant lobbying groups in shaping commercial policy. He now studies law at City, University of London as a Scholar of Gray's Inn. Outside of academia, Nicholas has served as the President of the University of London Law Society, the Secretary of the Oxford Union, and the Managing Editor the Oxford Political Review.

Ernest Lee is a second-year History and Politics student at Trinity College. He is interested in the history of development, security and international organisations, as well as the intersection between history, heritage, and various forms of media. In his free time, he enjoys long walks, listening to hip-hop, and Southeast Asian cinema.

Soline Schweisguth is a student at Ecole Normale Supérieure Paris-Saclay (France). She did a MSc in modern British History at Oxford before turning to Chinese history. She now continues her studies in History at Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales (EHESS, Paris) and in Mandarin at INALCO

Vaishna Surjid is a second year historian at Mansfield College. She is especially interested in modern African history and plans do further study exploring the ways in which literature and radio carved out space for negotiations of nationalist imagination in 1950s West Africa.
